It was late when the meeting finally dispersed, but even in the dark a white placard could be seen on the church door. No one stopped to read it that night, but the next morning it was read, and this is what was on it:

The town was and is still excited over this bulletin. Homebody tere the notice down. Mr. Fairchild obtained it and is anxious to find the person who wrote it. He means to prosecute some one for criminal fibel, but the townspeople do not yet know who that person is. Mr. Houghton has quietly refused to take any part in the intended presecution.

"His head is as level and, his heart is as warm as ever. Will he be a candidate again for Vice-Fresident? No. Nothing would tempt him to run again—not even the unanimous voice of a Democratic National Convention. He realizes he is growing old and has no desire for public life. His home life is a very happy one and his mind is fully occupied. Hasides, he is looked up to in Ohio to-day as he never was before. To-day he seems to have no enemies, and his opinion and advice are eagerly sought by men who have been against him in the years gone by. He will come to Washington woon on business." The stake was $0.00, of which $550 went to the winner. The four hundred speciators witnessed one of the pluckiest combate ever fought hereabouts in this class and the fight was very close. Cornell forced the fighting from the start and angeared to be a sure winner up to the twelfth round. Nelson had been holding back, however, occasionally dropping to escape punishment. When the time arrived. Nelson finished his man with a half dozen blows delivered with the utmost rapidity, knocking Cornell out in the sixteenth round.
